Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations

Comments from the Editors and Reviewers:

Reviewer #1: General comment: This paper attempts to address the changing nature of the Muslim-Christian relationship in Indonesia by highlighting the inception of regulation of house of worship among Christians and the barriers they should face from their Muslim counterparts. The author has presented theoretical expositions by explaining two main issues of the causes of religious intolerance: threat perception and worship restriction. The author has also made some arguments such as: the long process of evangelization and Islamization have become instrumental causes of (mutual) religious threat among both Muslims and Christians. The author also argues that worship restriction in Indonesia is a result of the changing of the political milieu in the aftermath of the reforms era which provided broader space for Muslims to influence the inception of religious regulation, including the establishment of the house of worship. This paper has also shown some cases of worship restriction experienced by the Christian communities.

Although this paper has addressed an interesting topic and is very timely in the Indonesian social-political landscape, some revisions are needed to strengthen the arguments.

First, the author may rethink a better flow of the narratives of Christian-Muslim relations in the Indonesian social-political landscape by telling the audiences/readers about some stories that grasp the reader's attention. Quotation of some American leaders such as Mike Pompeo, Barrack Obama, and Ban Ki-Moon may be interesting, but the author may present stronger statements from observers and researchers.

Second, the author should introduce and emphasize in the beginning why worship restriction does matter in Indonesia and how similar issues can also be discovered in other countries. The author may give a bigger picture of the restriction of the House of Worship in other Muslim countries and even in the West with the predominant Christian influences. Therefore, some new references about Muslim-Christian relations in other countries, especially those related to the controversy of the establishment of the house of worship, can enrich the exposition presented in this paper.

Third, the way the author underlines the argument discovered in other references can be improved. The author has referred to some important works written by previous scholars. However, the author fails to present the main argument. The author, for example, refers to the Mujiburrahman's, Arifiyanto, Aritonang and Steenbrink who have worked on Muslim-Christian Muslim relations. However, their main arguments are not well presented as the author pays attention to the events. The author, for example, cannot precisely say the difference between Mujiburrahman's conceptual argument in his Feeling Threatened and this work. The author may do a similar way to compare his article with other scholars who studied cases outside Indonesia (Turkey, Pakistan?).

Forth, the reviewer appreciates the author for his effort to present some interesting facts and data. Yet, the reviewer expects a stronger argument from the author and his critical analysis of other scholarly works. Last but not least, the conclusion part should be better improved by perhaps replacing the "recommendation section" with a stronger analytical exposition.

Reviewer #2: Please add comments you don't mind the author seeing.
